Tuesday and Thursday

10:20am – 11:40am

Instructor: Igor Vojnovic

Trade liberalization enabled greater flexibility in industrial location, and the subsequent economic restructuring was perhaps most evident with the 'deindustrialization' of manufacturing in the core world countries and the growth of labor-intensive industrial production in the lower-cost peripheral and semi-peripheral regions of the world. However, as production, services, and product distribution began to geographically disperse, managing these distant economic activities became a vital component of the new global economy. To this extent, while the removal of trade barriers was facilitating the spatial dispersal of economic activity, it was also recognized that a new form of territorial centralization was developing with high order management functions in a number of urban centers around the world.

This course will explore 20th century global economic restructuring and its social, economic, and political impacts on cities and their regions. A particular focus of the course will be directed to exploring the transformation of cities during the 20th century—ranging from social, economic, and political reorganization to the changing requirements in urban infrastructure and the changing form of the urban-built environment.
