FALL NEW COURSE OFFERING:PHL 353: Core Course in Peace and Justice Studies

Prof. Richard Peterson, instructing. T/TH, 2:40 pm - 4:00 pm

Our guiding aim will be to explore key concepts for pursuing a critical understanding of social violence. This also includes exploring ethical and political ideas relevant to the interpretation and challenge to organized social violence. In what ethical terms should we understand the damage done by violence as well as the nature of the outrage that sometimes leads people to act violently against others? In what political terms should we challenge violence? Here we will also discuss how such normative questions figure in thinking about the institutions that have harbored violence but also those that have resisted or provided alternatives to violence. This course is designed to meet the core course requirement for Peace and Justice Studies, but it is open to all students interested in the issues and materials it will take up. Readings will be from such thinkers as Rousseau, Marx, Freud, Gandhi and Galtung as well as the work of historians, anthropologists, sociologists, writers, and artists.
